FreeCD

FreeCD is an easy and reliable CD Player designed for Linux users. FreeCD can read all types of CDs, including CD-Rs, CD-RWs, DVD-R, DVD+R, and CD+RW, and it can be installed in Linux without hassle. The CDDDB can be used to get a list of information, such as a CD list, tracks, artists, and albums. Playlists can be created to organize your CD collection. Create your own playlists. Random playing. User defined directories. Record CDs. Support audio and video files. Synchronization of audio and video files. Audio data can be displayed on the screen. Follow links. Download pictures from the Internet. View and listen to HTML pages. Users can select a text to be copied to the clipboard. View windows. Support arbitrary icons. Detailed man page for all supported operations. Additional features are being added with each release. Uses GTK+ 2.x libraries. Note: If you want to have the latest development code, and if it works fine on your system, then you can subscribe to our develop branch (branch) via CVS. 1. The Philosophy Although FreeCD was written with X in mind, it can be easily ported to almost any other window manager. The goal is to have a very simple interface, based on the idea that a CD is simply an audio file. The user interface will try to stick to the standard X conventions, and nothing more. 2. How it Works A directory containing files in MPlayer format is mounted in /media/cdrom. The actual CD player is MPlayer, which is bound to that directory. The player tries to keep itself in the foreground, but if the window moves off the root window, it will be restored to the front. If the window moves off the root window and becomes unmapped, then the program waits for a mouse action, and then unmap the window. To browse the CDDDB, the program calls the X CDDDB applet, which communicates through MPlayer. When the user selects a track, the program calls X, which launches the program specified in the user's.Xdefaults. 3. Performance This is a simple program, but it is not very fast. For example, searching for the song "I Will Survive" from the CD "Survivor" takes about
