LINK | will find free PS, Xbox trials of Virtual reality racer Popular PlayStation VR (PSVR) Title LocoCycle hits Tokyo's Akihabara district, dishing up a third of a fun, 3-mile circuit, and the title is available for PlayStation, Xperia smartphones and Android on Google Play and the Arc Store. The Virtual reality arcade's quest to become Japan's number one racer continues as Rio 2016 Olympics looms close. Starting from 4 October, Train Simulator 2016, a Europe-focused but worldwide released game will hit the Japanese market with an Xbox VR demo. Locosolar, a Japanese developer and Tokyo-based VR games publisher, released their VR racing title LocoCycle. The new title aims to create a fun experience to play with a lack of cringeworthy moments while gameplay for those who train - be it for sprints, climbing or descending - will enable them to truly break into the top 'driving' tier. We've been given a tour of LocoCycle's VR course which feels clean, legible and loud, and we've got a taste of gameplay for the enthusiast feline. Geography ahead The LocoCycle's 2019 course is created across Tokyo's most frequented race circuit, Akihabara Electric Town and the mountains of Yagumo (Chiba). A three-mile challenge which can be safely completed by eight players and is priced at around ¥10,000 for PlayStation and Xbox, or ¥15,000 after discounts. The scale is set at a 1:160 ratio (roughly one mile to one metre), thus each road surface point is a metre long and users can look down, to their right or left, giving a sense of scale. In comparison, LocoCycle 2018 resided in Akihabara's Suidobashi district, which is slightly smaller in size (1.4-miles). But despite being in a bigger playground, Akihabara isn't just your normal racing circuit. It is a mixture of relaxing and more fun, dizzying sections of track, including narrow passages, ramps and more - the perfect location for a VR title. Kicking off, LocoCycle has its title screen yet, still, there's a surprise element to the user interface. We're actually looking down at a scale representation of the town
