Q: Is it a good idea to load on startup all libraries that user uses? I am working on a project for an online game where I have ~200+ libraries that are loaded on user startup, and I have an option to 'Select an Offline version of game' (which, yeah, sucks, but is a legal option for our customers). The problem is that: - Windows 10 loads loads libraries (like.netframework, atleast for me, it's mostly the libraries that I have to load to interact with files), which can be really annoying for the user. - Process explorer shows my process to be HUGE (>90 MB), which is also quite annoying. So, is it a good idea to load all these libraries at startup or is there any better option? A: So, is it a good idea to load all these libraries at startup or is there any better option? Neither. All of this would be tremendously annoying for the customer. The problem is that: - Windows 10 loads loads libraries (like.netframework, atleast for me, it's mostly the libraries that I have to load to interact with files), which can be really annoying for the user. If the customer chooses this option, then they know they're opting for the annoyance of having an offline system. - Process explorer shows my process to be HUGE (>90 MB), which is also quite annoying. This is much harder to fix. The game is offline, and so it'll be using the offline portions of.NET, which are a huge component of the application, and are typically loaded in the same process. So, is it a good idea to load all these libraries at startup or is there any better option? Either customer chooses the option that is less annoying, or you don't have to do any of this. You just have to make the game itself work offline. The best option here is to simply not load the game at all if the user opts for the offline version. A button to hide this option would be the appropriate solution. In Vivo Analyses of Amelogenin Expression in Tooth Development: New Insights Into Gene Targeting Using Gene Knockout Systems. Q: Get POST request as string in dart? Since dart 2.6.0, the variable changed to Map from Map. The question is, how can I have access to JSON representation of POST request without encoding it into string (change it to a string), that is: 1) To have read(HttpRequest request) method return HttpResponseFuture 2) To be able to parse/decode the string into JSON object A: To have read(HttpRequest request) method return HttpResponseFuture To get HttpResponseFuture just do: HttpResponse response = await http.get(""); HttpRequest request = new HttpRequest(""); HttpClient client = new HttpClient(); HttpClient http = new HttpClient(); HttpResponse response = await http.get(request); list> json = JSON.decode(response.body); print(json[0]['server']); // for example To be able to parse/decode the string into JSON object If you want to get Map response and json variable you could change the code above like this: HttpResponse response = await http.post("", headers: {'Accept': 'application/json'}, body: jsonString) .then((HttpClientRequest request) { HttpClient client = new HttpClient(); response = await client.send(request); return JSON.decode(response.body); }); Also you could create class with Map and implement it's interface: class JsonResponse{ Map _jsonData; Map get jsonData => _jsonData; Map set jsonData(Map jsonData) => _jsonData = jsonData; JsonResponse() { _jsonData = new Map(); } Map toString() => _json
